“ Sometimes, if you’re very lucky, you’re blessed with a real-life guardian angel. For me, that angel was my Aunt Jeanne. So much more than an aunt, she was like the perfect big sister. For as long as I can remember, Aunt Jeanne was a vibrant, fun-loving, abiding presence in my life. She was my babysitter when I was little, the person who helped me navigate the stormy seas of adolescence over tea and angel food cake, and the one who became a treasured friend as I grew into adulthood. She taught me how to put on make-up, shave my legs, and do the Locomotion. She nursed me through broken romances and fractured friendships, laughed with me over the latest schoolgirl gossip, and shared my frustrations when life took an unwelcome turn. She rejoiced in my accomplishments and propped me up when I failed. She was someone I could always rely on, as constant as the North Star. And like a star, she lit up my life with her special light. When I awoke on Sunday morning, my first thought was that this was the first day I’d spend on the planet without my Aunt Jeanne. But I soon discovered that wasn’t really true. She was with me when I sat down to do a crossword puzzle over my morning tea. She was beside me when I put on the Genie bra she insisted I buy, telling me it was the most comfortable thing she’d ever worn. She was watching over my shoulder when I watered the plant she gave me when I moved to Florida. I heard her laughter in the tinkling of the windchime she made for me from shells she collected in Sanibel. She was whispering in my ear when I sat down to edit my writing, and I felt her excitement when a summer thunderstorm blew in from the Gulf. When I finally lay down to sleep, I realized that there would never be a day without my Aunt Jeanne. And I know that someday we’ll meet again, sit down over tea and angel food cake, and catch up on all that’s happened since she became a real angel.
